OVERALL STATUS

RED

Right now your brand is working against you. The good news: the fixes are clear and achievable.

Your scores at a glance

WHAT'S INSIDE

01

What the scores mean

A plain-English read of each of the three dimensions.

02

How you compare

Where you sit against the typical business in your sector.

03

Your top 3 priorities

Ordered by impact and calibrated for a business your size.

What the scores mean

A plain-English read of where you stand across the three dimensions.

out of 10

Brand Clarity

AMBER

You know who you serve and what you sell, but your differentiator is soft — 'relationships with farmers and free local delivery' is true of most specialty roasters your size. Without a sharper answer to 'why us, not them,' wholesale buyers default to price, which is exactly why you've plateaued.

out of 10

Brand Consistency

RED

Your brand is working against itself right now. Old logos still live on packaging, your Instagram voice and your newsletter voice sound like two different businesses, and you have no guidelines to stop the drift. Cafes deciding whether to stock you look for signals of a grown-up brand — inconsistency reads as amateur, even when the coffee is excellent.

Brand Visibility

RED

You're findable if someone's already looking for you, but nothing is pulling new people in. Your Google Business Profile is actively hurting trust with wrong opening hours, you're invisible to AI tools that buyers increasingly use to shortlist suppliers, and one press mention in eight months is too thin to build momentum.

How you compare

Two views of the same data. The shape on the left shows your brand's balance; the bars on the right show you against the typical business in your sector.

HOW TO READ THIS

The radar chart shows the shape of your brand. A balanced triangle means you're developing all three dimensions evenly; a lopsided one means you've invested heavily in some areas and let others slide. The bars on the right tell you whether you're keeping pace with the rest of your sector — any coral bar shorter than its grey counterpart is a gap worth closing.

Your top 3 priorities

Ordered by impact, calibrated for a business your size. Start with #1.

Write a one-page positioning document

TIMEFRAME 2 weeks

EFFORT Low — one working session

Before any design or marketing spend, nail down three things on paper: who you're for (be specific — which kind of cafe, which kind of home brewer), the single sharpest thing you do that competitors don't, and one sentence your ideal wholesale customer would use to describe you to a peer. This is the document every future decision gets measured against. Without it, the other fixes won't stick.

Fix your Google Business Profile this week

TIMEFRAME 1 hour

EFFORT Tiny — free and immediate

Update opening hours, add current photos of your roastery and packaging, post one update, and ask three regulars to leave reviews. This is the single highest-ROI hour you can spend. For a local B2B business, an active Google profile is doing more work than your website right now — and yours is currently telling buyers you're inattentive.

Pick one consistent visual system and retire the old one

TIMEFRAME 6 weeks

EFFORT Medium — one freelance brief, ~£800–£1,500

You don't need full brand guidelines yet. You need a one-page visual standard: final logo (pick one, destroy the rest), two fonts, a three-colour palette, and a packaging template. Brief your existing freelance designer to produce it. Once it exists, apply it everywhere in 30 days and ban exceptions. This alone will move you from feeling 'scrappy' to feeling 'deliberate' — which is what your wholesale pipeline needs to unstick.

INDUSTRY CONTEXT

Strong specialty roasters at your revenue stage almost always have three things you don't: a documented origin story or sourcing philosophy that justifies a premium over supermarket specialty, a wholesale deck that makes the case in under five minutes, and an active presence in two or three specific places — typically Instagram plus one trade publication plus one regional food media outlet. The coffee itself is almost never the bottleneck at your stage; the brand around it is.
